II.1.5) Short description of the contract or purchase(s)

More and more, house and landowners want to have access to legal information of their own property. Currently they are very dependent on Kadaster and have to pay to get the information. The cadastral map, which is used in this process, is designed as a geographical view on the registration with limited geometric quality and it fits that purpose very well. However, people will zoom in and rely on the details they find. Due to the nature of the data, a distance between two lines might have errors up to half a metre on the map. These differences may lead to misunderstandings and wrong assumptions. Kadaster wants to improve the communication about the cadastral map but also to enhance the quality of the map. For that purpose, we started a research project to find out the possibility to create this improved map using automated processes. We intend to do this by interpreting the information found on field sketches.

In this market survey we are asking companies to provide us with information that might contribute to partial or complete solutions to our very specific questions. The keyword here is feasibility, which is a key indicator in our decision making process. We are providing a case with a description of the challenge and a description of a possible outcome of the process. We also provide you with information about the rules that define the content of the field sketches. Interpreting the information found on the field sketches is our primary goal for the initial step in the process.
